

Small Cats of South Africa seen on Photo Safari

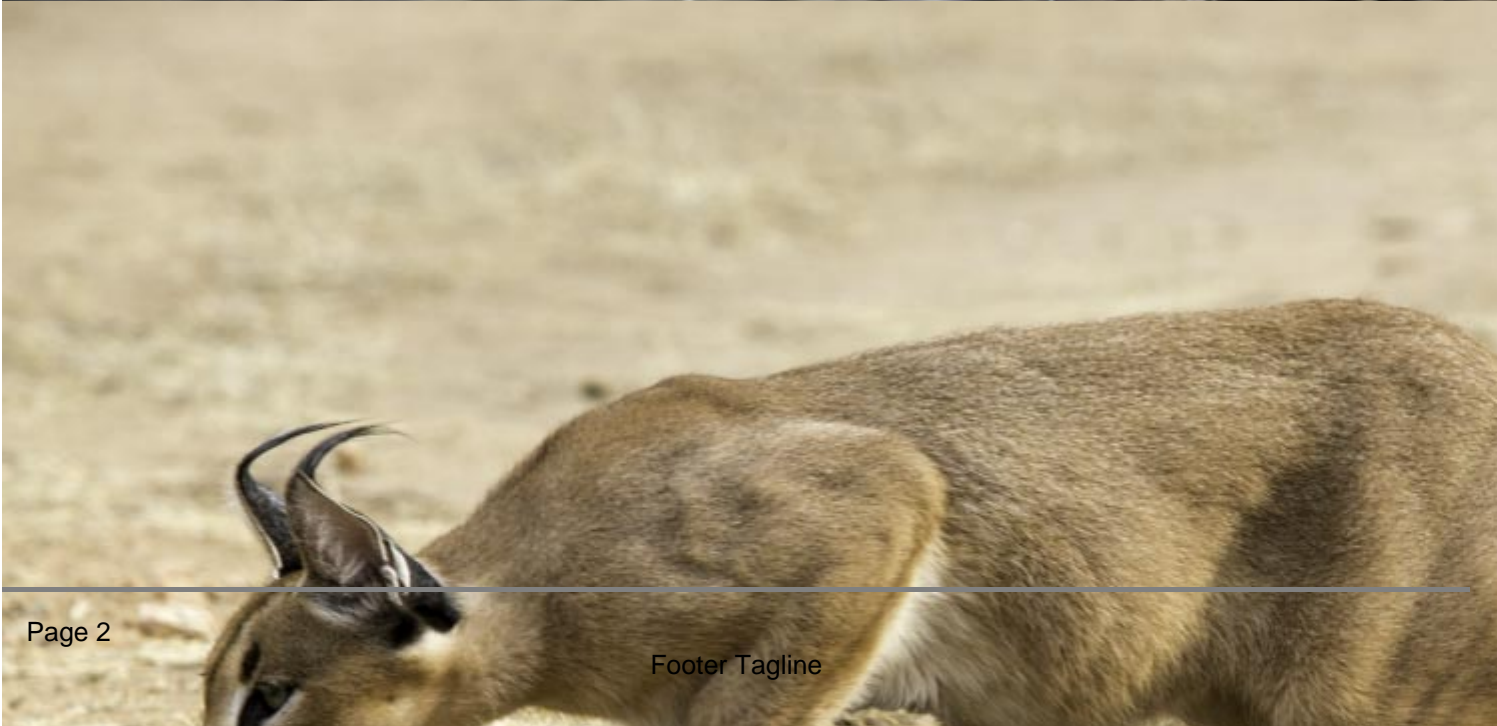

Description

The lions, cheetahs and leopards – the big cats – get a great deal of attention during safaris. Quietly hunting and living in the bush are smaller species of cats. These less celebrated cats are very interesting to see and watch and have loads of charisma.

On my photo safaris in South Africa I have been thrilled to see three small cat species with some frequency.

ock tufts ve to catch ases

African Wild Cat

As you can tell immediately from looking at an African Wild Cat that they are ancestors of the domestic cat. On my first encounter with one I was sure someone had lost or dumped their cat in Kruger park. They are found all over the African continent and middle east. They hunt primarily mice, rats, and small mammals but fish, birds, reptiles, and insects are taken if the opportunity arises. The hunt is typically at twilight or night and the method is with stealth and pouncing.

We are lucky to have several roaming our reserve and every sighting is special, but my first reaction is still to think of a domestic cat – until I notice the long legs and unique red markings.

© AfricaWildSafaris.net

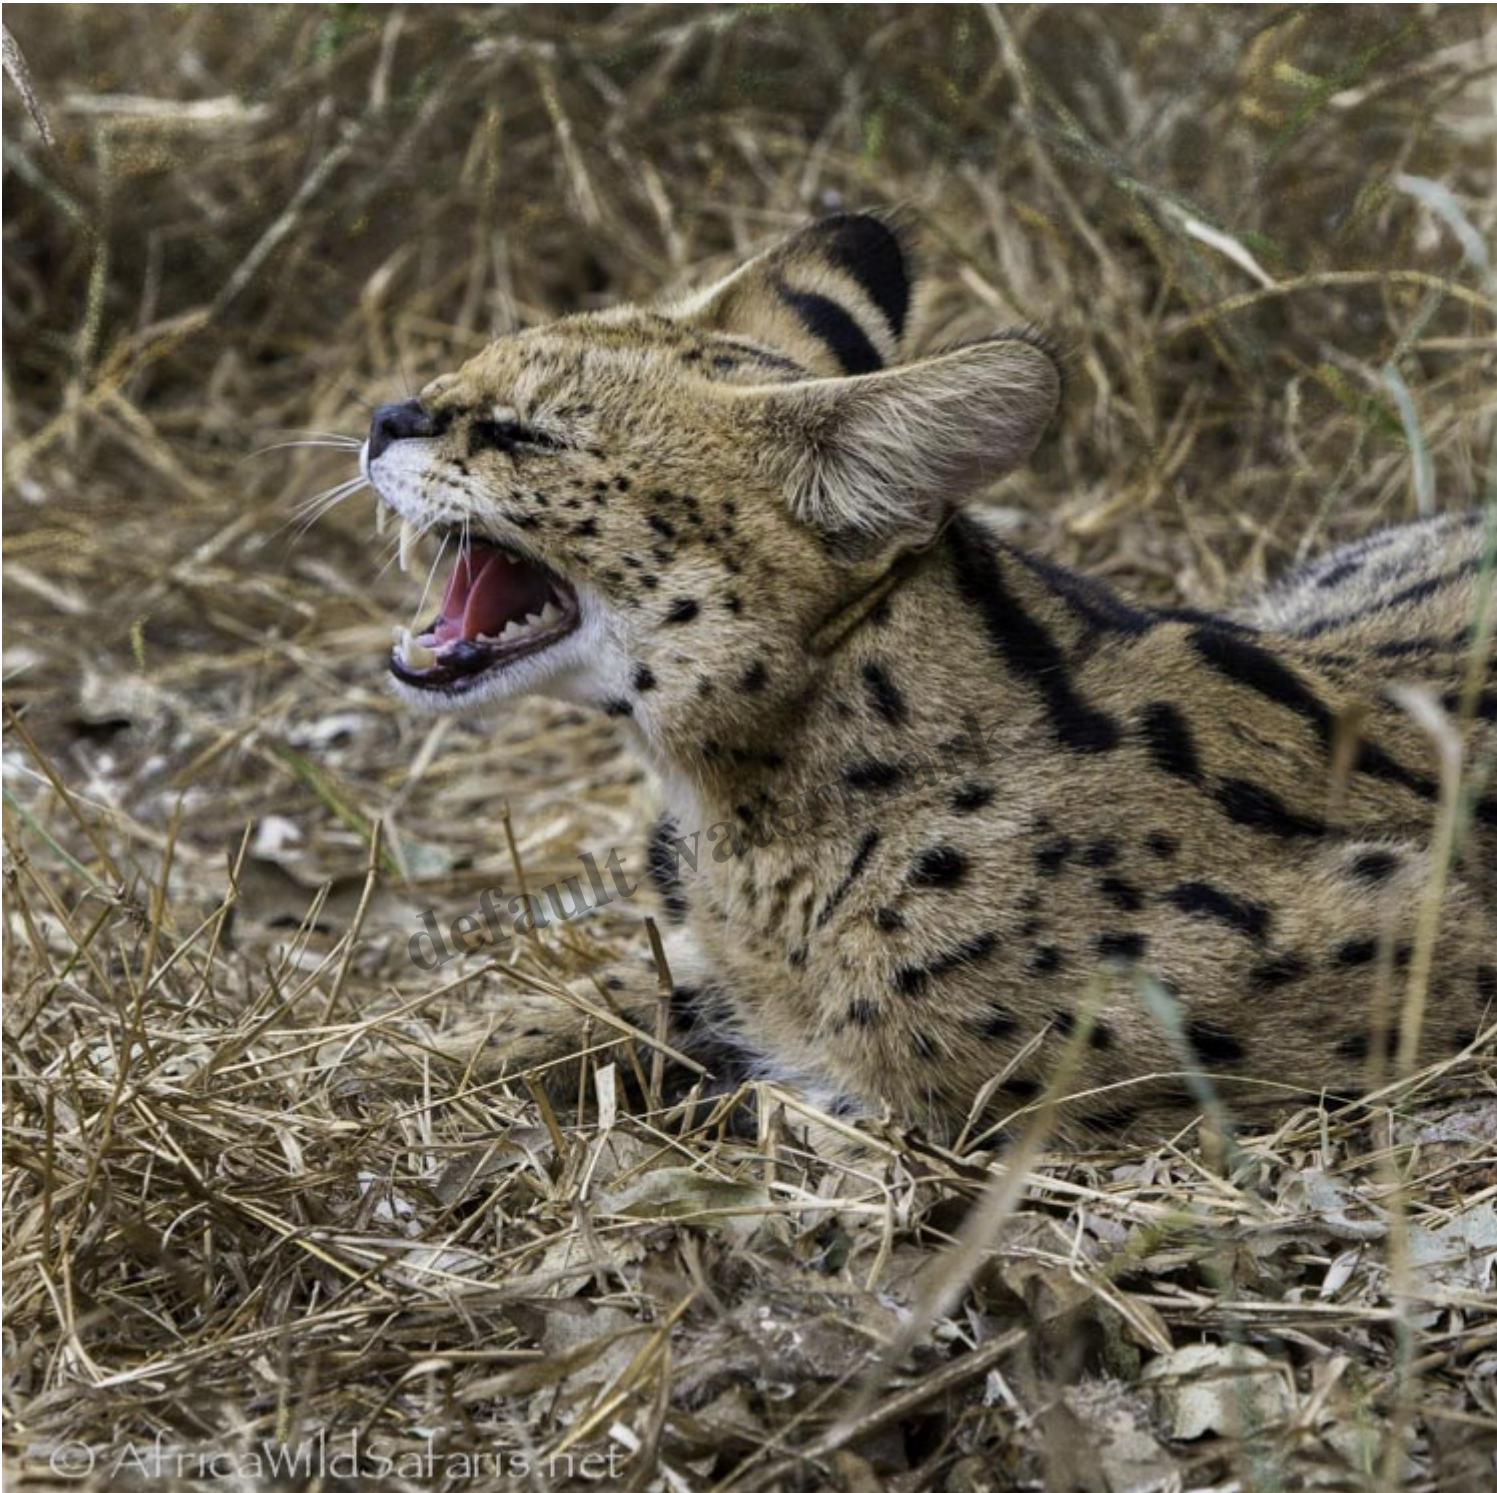

Serval

Servals are considered the best hunters in the cat world with a 50% kill rate (for comparison, a domestic cat's rate is 10%). They hunt by stealth then jump onto the prey incapacitating them with their weight, then give a fatal bite to the neck.

The serval has the longest legs of any cat in proportion to its body. Its spots sometimes cause it to be mistaken for a young leopard or cheetah. Many are killed because of this mistaken identity and because they hunt chickens on farms. They are the subject of conservation efforts to reintroduce them to southern areas of South Africa.

This is a cat I wish I would see more often. They are very interesting to watch while hunting and they are as beautiful and dramatic to photograph as cheetahs.

While everyone loves the African favorites: lion, zebra, leopard, etc. the longer I spend in the bush, the more fascinated I become with the lesser know species.

I like to present and emphasize the total ecosystem view to my safari guests teaching them to see and appreciate how large and small species all interconnect. There is so much here to see and learn and it keeps us coming back.

Join one of our photo safaris and help us seek out the amazing small cats of South Africa

Current Photo Safari Dates

Favorite Moments from my Photo Safari

What is the Best Season to go on Safari?

Category

1. African Wildlife
2. Know Your Subject
3. Photography on Safari

Tags

1. African Wild Cat
2. caracal
3. photo safari workshop with small African cats
4. serval
5. small African Cats
6. small cats of South Africa
7. Small cats seen on photo safari

Date Created

January 5, 2015

Author

africawildsafaris

default watermark